Matthew and his work

Matthew Webber's work is inspired by the collision of natural and urban landscapes, often influenced directly by the areas of Epping Forest which surround his East London studio.

His technique is an unusual one, in which multiple layers of oil and acrylic are methodically applied over a period of months or sometimes years, creating a dense block of imagery and paint, which is subsequently scraped and sanded away. This reversal of the process (which he calls 'unpainting') creates new connections and relationships, as each stage of the making reveals itself - all the way back to the very first mark.

This is when the method of making these works resembles sculpture or carving more than painting. Long-buried colours and structures emerge through the now mirror-smooth surface, creating an intricately interwoven network of lines and motifs in which both the city and the woodland landscape in which the work had its origin seem to manifest themselves.

At this stage the multiple layers of accumulated paint will either coalesce to form a finished work of art, or disappear completely, to be started again from scratch.

Matthew has been producing work in his East London studio for more than 20 years, exhibiting his paintings throughout the UK and the United States. For a detailed CV and more information, please visit his website or find him on Instagram.
